
The approximately 1,000 miles of interstate highways in Virginia are indicated by the heavy lines on the map.

Engineers To Study New Interstate Road System In Virginia

Consulting engineers have been engaged by the State Highway Department to study the locations for future improvements on Virginia's 1,000-mile system of interstate roads.

The New York firm, Howard, Needles, Tamman and Bergendoff, also will prepare estimates for the cost of constructing the interstate highways to new standards required as a result of the recently-enacted federal-aid highway act. The consultants' report, the Highway Department said, is due by December 1 and will form the basis of a report which the Department must make to the U. S. Bureau of Public Roads by next January 1.

Highway Department officials have estimated that, as a result of the new standards, as much as 700 miles of the interstate network in Virginia may have to be relocated.

F. A. Davis, chief engineer for the Department, said that in some cases present routes may be used as service roads and new parallel highways built. In other cases, he added, marginal development along highways will force the Department to make extensive relocations.

The new Federal highway act provides for the building of the interstate system in Virginia and also increases slightly yearly appropriations for other highways in the state - primary, secondary and urban. Standards set for interstate highways are designed to meet the needs of traffic forecast for 1975 and will incorporate the most modern features of safety and utility to provide for safer driving and economy of motor vehicle operation.

Access on these roads will be controlled and facilities will be planned to enable vehicles to enter the highway safely. Grade separation structures will be built to carry intersecting roads over or under interstate routes. All of the system in Virginia will consist of divided highways with four or more traffic lanes.

Medians (divided strips) on the divided highways will be at least 36 feet wide, but in urban and mountainous areas a minimum of 16 feet will be permitted. Where unusual conditions exist, the median may be reduced to not less than four feet.

Davis said that it would be impossible to go ahead with any of the interstate projects until after the first of the year. He explained that the "project priority" will be determined "primarily on the basis of need — the volume of traffic in relation to existing facilities." He indicated that the first actual construction work under the new program should be underway by next spring.

Interstate highways in Virginia include U. S. 11, 1, 55, 29, 211, 168 and setcions of 250, 60 and 301.

SOIL SAMPLING CONTINUES

BIG BUSINESS AT VPI

Sampling of Virginia soils with the aim of advising Virginia farmers on lime and fertilizer requirements—continues to be big business at VPI laboratories.

W. W. Lewis, agronomist at the college, says Virginia farmers sent in 964 samples for testing under the new regulations, during the July 1 - July 1956 period. Reports on these charts lime, organic matter, phosphorus, magnesium, phosphate and potash needs. Testing is done in accordance with the State ASC committee's concerns only lime and phosphate, as necessary for certain ASC practices, Lewis explains.

Total samples tested amounted to 49,106, only a slight drop from the preceding year, when 49,500 samples were tested.

Farmers who haven't taken advantage of the free service would benefit by doing so, Lewis says. Most months are from January through April, and samples sent in during these times of the year are handled more rapidly. This past year, the rush didn't hit in March, with a total of 6,000 samples.

Lewis says soil should be tested generally, once every rotation in cropland; and every two or three years for pasture and alfalfa.

Several counties topped the list, counting both regular and lime-mark in samples sent in. Leading the list, counting both regular and lime-mark samples were: Frederick, 1,406; Southampton, 1,354; Pittsylvania, 1,855; Nansemond, 1,145; and Augusta, 1,414.

County agents and other agricultural agricultural workers are giving directions for taking and mailing soil samples for testing.

THANKFUL FOR HURRY

Oklahoma City, Okla.—Mrs. Ruth Steeds was glad he ate in a hurry—quickly that day. Fifteen minutes after he had eaten, the right front wheel of a large truck flew into the kitchen and bounced around the room. Anyone in the room at the time would have been killed or seriously injured. Damage was estimated at $1,000.
